dren were going to have their never-been-sullied ears exposed to liberal rhetoric and this, in his opinion, was not good. Further conversation revealed that the guy didn't even have children of his own, and if he did, the would-be family didn't live in the Oakwood school district.

I was further amazed to read that some schools locally and across the nation were pressured into not broadcasting the speech on school property and some parents were even being counseled to keep their children home on what was the first day of school for many. What a pack of cowards. I'm so glad Oakwood schools saw fit to provide a venue for each school to watch the speech, and the freedom to attend or not attend.

What was given by the President was an eloquent, positive, motivational speech that pushed all the right buttons and hit all the stops – in my opinion. It was especially humorous to hear how Obama's own education was enhanced when his mother would drag him out of bed at 4:30 in the morning for her own version of "home schooling."

TV pundits blamed racism as the reason for all the rancor. Racism had nothing to do with it. It was interesting to note that President George H.W. Bush addressed young people on television and earlier in the decade, President Ronald Reagan had a little talk with America's youth as well. Nobody complained then. He even gave them marching orders, telling the youngsters to tell their parents to support his upcoming tax cut proposal.

This past weekend, on the HBO politicomedy program Real Time with Bill Maher, the topic of the President's speech came up with the unanimous opinion that the folks making all the fuss were flat out crazy. Noting past presidential brushes with children and the respect shown for the office, Real Time guest and former National Security Advisor Richard Clarke recalled a children's program he used to watch in the 50's (when he was a kid) where at the end of every show the children would all gather together and toast President Eisenhower with a glass of milk.

Now those were the days.
